The World Short of Beef.

Not only in the United States are meats of all kinds advancing in value, but it is the case all over the world. There has not been within the present generation such a prospect of beef famine in all countries taken together as there is at the present time. One thing which is so favorably affecting the outlook for our cattle export trade is that other countries which have heretofore drawn on different sources of supply are liable to be compelled to come to us for

The Fall-Off in Weight of Cattle.

One thing affecting and to some extent stimulating the cattle trade at this time which should not be overlooked, is that the average weight of the ripened steer is somewhat less than in ordinary seasons when corn is plenty and cheap. It is not too much to say that the average weight of beeves going to the block now is from fifty to seventy-five pounds per head less than in years when corn was plenty. This does not seem like a very great item, but when so many pounds per capita are counted off the large number of cattle marketed, it will be seen that it must have a considerable bearing on the beef supply. Cattle have been for during the past winter just as little as feeders felt safe in giving them if they would obtain anything like results, and the outcome is the difference in weight on which we have been commenting.—[National Stockman.] tional Stockman
